Let's Start At The Beginning...

THE LITTLE SETTLEMENT OF WATTSVILLE, GEORGIA

In 1822, twenty families were living in log cabins calling their little settlement Wattsville. They made paths and roads that crossed at right angles through thickets of tall pines, waving saplings, and rich undergrowth or red oak to connect with each other and lead back to civilization.

The desirable land soon drew more settlers. Purchasers came not only from surrounding counties but from neighboring Florida, North Carolina and South Carolina.

THE EARLY YEARS (1824-1912)

The original city limits of Perry formed a rough circle with a half-mile radius from the courthouse square, except for where Big Indian Creek formed a natural boundary for the city.

Perry became the center of business for Houston County. Several small industries grew around Perry including gristmills, sawmills, and cotton gins.

The population stayed relatively small with only 836 people in the 1870 Census. Significant growth would not come to Perry area until the 20th century.

BUSINESS CENTER (1912-1945)

The City of Perry's historic downtown began to form into its current shape through the 1910s and 1920s. A number of one and two story shops and businesses were built along Carroll Street between Ball Street and Washington Street.

The spread of new technology into rural Houston County facilitated downtown Perry's formation, particularly with the first electric lighting in 1912.

The 1920s and 1930s saw sustained population growth with 1,542 people according to the Census in 1940.

POST-WAR BOOM (1945-1990)

In June 1941, a regional effort succeeded in gaining approval from the U.S. War Department to construct what is now known as Robins Air Force Base.

Between 1940 and 1960, Perry's population quadrupled. I-75 was completed through Perry in 1960s.

In 1990, Perry cemented its status as a center of agriculture for rural south and central Georgia with the Georgia National Fairgrounds and Agricenter. The Georgia National Fair regularly brings in more than half a million people to Perry each October.

A NEW ERA (1990-2020)

Perry's population started to grow again in the 2000s and 2010s. Officials began investing in the development of the downtown area and community at large.

Perry Parkway was built in the 1990s to draw new development on the outskirts of the city.
